The story of a product advertisement

PACK SHOT

I was worried that the image alone wouldn't say "advertising" so I had to add a headline and this type to make it clear that I have attempted a studio-like piece of product photography. The image was created by placing the box on a length of lining paper taped to the wall to create a 'no horizon' background. With my camera on a tripod I experimented with bracketed exposures to process as HDR images as well as using a neutral density filter to attempt to colour the background and dampen the shadow with a reflector (not very successful) during long exposure versions.

The bottom facing edge of the pack needs some serious retouching to meet the standards of advertising photography. I was also hoping that a longish focal length would render the background more blurred than is the case. I have also created a file showing most of the alternative versions – only took about half an hour.
